IDEAL FOR
First-Timers, Couples, Families

Three cities, five hundred years, and one of the most travelled routes in the world — which is exactly why it is worth doing properly. The Golden Triangle earned its name because Delhi, Agra and Jaipur sit almost equidistant from one another, and because between them they hold the Mughal and Rajput high-water marks: a capital rebuilt seven times, a city drawn on paper before a stone was laid, and a tomb that has never been bettered.

This version takes six days rather than four. That extra room is the whole point: sunrise at the Taj instead of mid-morning, an afternoon free in Jaipur's bazaars, and Fatehpur Sikri treated as a destination rather than a photo stop on the way to somewhere else. Every transfer, guide and reservation is handled, so the only decision left to you is when to stop for chai.

Journey Highlights

- Begin in Old Delhi among Shah Jahan's seventeenth-century city — Jama Masjid, Chandni Chowk and the quiet of Raj Ghat.
- Climb to Qutub Minar and Humayun's Tomb, two UNESCO World Heritage Sites that bracket five centuries of Delhi's history.
- Drive the old road to Jaipur, arriving in a city built to a plan in 1727 and still painted its founding pink.
- Explore Amer Fort's four courtyards, the mirrored Sheesh Mahal, and the Sukh Niwas cooled by wind drawn over falling water.
- Stand inside Jantar Mantar, the eighteenth-century observatory whose stone instruments still keep time to two seconds.
- Wander Fatehpur Sikri, Akbar's perfect red-sandstone capital, abandoned after fourteen years and left almost untouched.
- See the Taj Mahal at first light, then Agra Fort across the river — the place from which Shah Jahan finally watched it.

Day 01 Delhi — Two Cities in One Day

Met at the airport and taken to your hotel, then out into a capital that has been rebuilt at least seven times. The morning belongs to Old Delhi: Shah Jahan's walled city of 1639, the great courtyard of the Jama Masjid, and the lanes of Chandni Chowk, where the spice market has not changed its business in three hundred years. Raj Ghat, where Gandhi was cremated, is quieter. In the afternoon, Qutub Minar — India's tallest minaret, begun in 1192 — and Humayun's Tomb, the garden mausoleum that taught the Taj Mahal what it wanted to be.

Day 02 Into Rajasthan — Delhi to Jaipur

Drive — 274 km

An early start and a long, easy road south. Jaipur was founded in 1727 by Maharaja Sawai Jai Singh II, and unusually for an Indian city of its age it was drawn on paper first — nine rectangular sectors, wide straight streets, a grid a modern planner would recognise. The rest of the day is yours for the bazaars, which is how the city is best met: on foot, slowly, with no particular list.

Day 03 Jaipur — Amer, Mirrors and an Observatory

The morning begins above the city at Amer Fort, built in sandstone and marble by Raja Man Singh and arranged around four courtyards. Inside are the Diwan-e-Aam and Diwan-e-Khas, the halls of public and private audience, the Sheesh Mahal lined with mirrors, and the Sukh Niwas, cooled by wind drawn across a water cascade — air conditioning, four centuries early. In the city proper, the seven-storey City Palace mixes Mughal, Rajput and European hands, and Jantar Mantar's stone instruments still measure the sky. Hawa Mahal's honeycomb facade is best seen from the street.

Day 04 Fatehpur Sikri — A Capital Abandoned

Drive — 244 km

Between Jaipur and Agra stands the strangest thing on this route: a complete imperial city, built by Akbar in the 1570s and left after only fourteen years when the water ran short. Because nobody came after, almost nothing was altered. You walk through the Jama Masjid, the marble tomb of Salim Chishti, the five-tiered Panch Mahal, Birbal's house and the Ibadat Khana, where Akbar invited scholars of every faith to argue in front of him. Then on to Agra, with the evening free for the bazaars.

Overnight in Agra

Day 05 Agra — The Taj at First Light

Early, because the Taj Mahal deserves the hour before the heat and the crowds, when the marble takes colour from the sky and gives it back. Shah Jahan built it for Mumtaz Mahal between 1632 and 1653; it is closed on Fridays. Afterwards, Agra Fort, a UNESCO site of red sandstone holding the Khas Mahal, the Jahangir Palace and the two audience halls — and the octagonal tower where Shah Jahan spent his last years with a clear view downriver to what he had made. The afternoon is free for the marble inlay workshops the city still lives by.

Day 06 Agra — Departure

Drive — 231 km

A last morning in Agra, then the road back to Delhi airport in good time for your onward flight. Most long-haul departures leave late in the evening, so a Delhi hotel is not usually needed; if your flight is an early one, we will arrange a day room rather than have you wait in a terminal.

Departure

Practical notes

Best time to visit

October to March. The Golden Triangle is uncomfortable from late April until the monsoon breaks, and December mornings can bring fog that delays road travel.

Getting there

Delhi's Indira Gandhi International (DEL) is the arrival and departure point, and is the best-connected airport in northern India.

Ideal duration

Six days is the honest minimum for all three cities. Add two nights if you would like Ranthambore or a Jaipur heritage hotel stay.

Pace

Moderate. Two driving days of roughly four to five hours each, with monument mornings and free afternoons in between.
